Report on the situation of human rights in occupied Kuwait

Agenda item 12 (b)

With the barbaric Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in the early hours of 2 August 1990, the stage was set for a many-faceted human tragedy. Both nationals and residents of Kuwait fell victim to criminal and inhumane acts committed by the Iraqi forces. From the very beginning of the invasion, the Iraqis committed the most heinous crimes, including murder, rape, arrests, threats and the destruction and looting of public and private property. It was clear that these barbaric and repressive practices were planned in advance by the Iraqi authorities as a means of achieving the primary objective of the invasion: to humiliate, demean and terrorize the Kuwaiti people and to obliterate the Kuwaiti national identity as a first step towards the achievement of their political plan of occupying Kuwait and annexing it to Iraq.

The barbaric practices of the Iraqi forces in Kuwait constitute a flagrant violation of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, which embody international human rights principles and are binding on all States Parties, including Iraq. The Arab Organization of Human Rights says in a report dated 16 October 1990 on the "Situation of Human Rights in Kuwait since the Iraqi Invasion" that "there has been a violation of almost every single paragraph of the body of international legislative instruments constituting international law and international human rights principles that have evolved as binding law for all parties, including Iraq".

Under an information black-out and with the refusal of Iraqi forces to allow humanitarian organizations to investigate violations of human rights in Kuwait, the Iraqi authorities committed daily the most outrageous mass and individual crimes against not only Kuwaitis, but also most Arab and non-Arab residents. Fearing these criminal acts, people stayed at home in terror and in fear, not knowing when Iraqi soldiers would break in to loot property, arrest a family member or sexually assault a woman.

People did not leave their homes because they wanted to spare themselves degrading and rough treatment at the hands of Iraqi soldiers at checkpoints. The soldiers normally harassed people and often stole their money, watches, pens, identification documents and even cars. People became more afraid to leave their homes when Iraqi soldiers used the checkpoints as stations for making arrests. While a driver sat behind the wheel, an Iraqi soldier would place a bullet or a leaflet in the trunk of the car, thus producing false evidence to warrant the arrest of the driver. Many people were thus arrested at these points. Movement, even for essential purposes, became difficult because of these checkpoints and the degrading treatment by Iraqi soldiers. To tighten their grip on Kuwait and their control over the population, moreover, the occupation forces imposed night-long curfews.

Iraqi soldiers resorted more frequently to mass punishment to induce fear in the population. They often arrested and tortured all members of a family in order to find one person, thus violating article 33 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (1949). Iraqi soldiers would burn down several houses if the body of one

Iraqi soldier was discovered or a shot was heard in the area. In this respect, attention is drawn to the Amnesty International report of 19 December 1990, which states that, on 7 September, after resistance in Kaifan, "Iraqi soldiers surrounded the area with their tanks and bombarded it with artillery fire, destroying a number of houses. In mid-September, Iraqi forces, upon discovering the bodies of four soldiers, surrounded the area, searched homes and burnt down 25 houses."

Iraqi soldiers also committed collective organized sabotage, looting and theft of Government offices, hospitals, schools, Kuwait University, research institutes and laboratories, companies, shops, private homes, stores, garages, etc.

Iraq stole 15 Kuwait Airways aircraft, as well as equipment and spare parts that were found in abundance in maintenance workshops and warehouses. They also stole equipment and medical supplies from hospitals and the Ministry of Health. They concentrated especially on dismantling and removing modern medical equipment from specialized medical centres, such as Hussein Makki Jomaa Hospital for the Treatment of Cancer and Hamed Al-Issa Centre for Kidney Treatment, Ibn Sina Hospital for Eye and Nerve Surgergy, Al-Razi Hospital for Bone Surgery and the Obstetrics Hospital, where they stole incubators, leaving 300 underdeveloped babies to die without any religious, human or ethical scruple (see report of Amnesty International, December 1990, p. 56).

From schools, Iraqis took away chairs, desks, blackboards and other educational equipment in addition to books. Kuwait University was not spared the looting, for Iraqis dismantled and removed research equipment and teaching aids from laboratories, as well as thousands of the latest computers and books, periodicals, documents and manuscripts from libraries, and destroyed remaining files and officials papers. The Iraqis used schools and university buildings as centres of detention and torture and as barracks for soldiers and they set up anti-aircraft artillery on the roofs. Kuwait's Institute of Scientific Research, considered the most modern and most important scientific research centre in the Middle East, particularly in the areas of petroleum, agriculture, fisheries, energy and environmental research, was also ransacked. Iraqis stole scientific equipment and computers and took away books, periodicals and scientific reports from the Institute's specialized library.

Iraqis also stole Kuwait's reserves of gold ingots and cash from the Central Bank and the contents of the Treasury. They took away the assets of national banks and their looting spread to garages and car stores. According to car suppliers' estimates there were at least 10,000 new cars in the warehouses and stores at the time of the invasion and they were all stolen. The Iraqis also stole thousands of tons of foodstuffs from private dealers and food companies and the stores of co-operatives, thus producing a severe shortage of foodstuffs in Kuwait.

The Iraqis concentrated their efforts on confiscating the property and funds of senior Government officials and Kuwaiti families, destroying or burning houses and other property following looting. The Iraqis also removed the contents of the Kuwait National Museum which houses Kuwait's historical relics, some dating from 6600 B.C., as well as precious traditional Kuwaiti and rare Islamic pieces which were transported in a primitive way, that damaged many of them and made them worthless. These acts are contrary to article 53 of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 1949. There is no doubt that this criminal act harms not only Kuwait, but Islamic and world civilization as a whole, since these rare pieces form part of mankind's history and civilization.

The Iraqi authorities deprived Kuwaiti citizens of personal freedoms which they enjoyed before the invasion, such as freedom of movement, freedom of expression, freedom to work and freedom of education. The occupation forces set up checkpoints everywhere and controlled schools and the media, including radio, television and newspapers. They stole printing equipment from publishing houses and newspapers and published a daily newspaper containing military communiqués and decisions of the Iraqi leadership. A decision published by the Iraqi authorities threatened that Kuwaiti officials of higher grades who did not resume work as of 22 September 1990 would be liable to the death penalty.

As a result of these repressive and barbaric practices, hundreds of thousands of citizens and foreigners fled the country to save their lives and honour, leaving behind their property and relatives. One of the main reasons for the departure of Kuwaiti families from their country was the daily harassment by Iraqi forces and intelligence officers in search of military personalities and officials of the Ministry of the Interior, national guard and special forces officers, as well as members of the National Assembly and the National Council, other leading personalities and businessmen, any other persons who might be suspected of collaborating with the resistance and any personality that might play a leadership role in the country. Kuwaiti families were thus dispersed in various capitals of the world. In addition to nearly 300,000 citizens who left Kuwait after the invasion, there were over 100,000 Kuwaitis abroad for the summer holidays. Whether they are in Kuwait or outside the country, Kuwaitis have been living in despair since the invasion and in a disturbed psychological state owing to the breakdown of contacts between the members of families in Kuwait and those abroad.

What is happening in Kuwait has obviously drastically affected the psychological state of Kuwaiti children, especially those who live through the nightmare watching aircraft fly over their homes, hearing the deafening noise of guns and seeing their relatives arrested or shot. Thousands of children have fled the country with their families to escape the daily torture, leaving behind relatives, books, toys, playgrounds, friends and memories. Kuwaiti children have become refugees not knowing their own destiny.

The above are only a few examples of many inhumane and repressive practices by Iraqi authorities in occupied Kuwait. Such practices have no precedent in history and no explanation or justification, especially as there had never been any hostility between the two neighbouring Muslim peoples of Iraq and Kuwait. The only possible explanation is that these practices are simply a reflection of the greed of the Iraqi ruling authorities and their desire to plunder Kuwait. This is an aggressive scheme aiming at dispersing the people of Kuwait, obliterating the Kuwaiti national identity and removing the name of Kuwait from the world political map. The Kuwaiti citizen lost his right to self-determination when the Iraqi authorities, in violation of international law and custom, annexed a large part of Kuwaiti territory to the Basrah Governorate and called the remaining part of Kuwait the nineteenth Governorate of Iraq. The Iraqi authorities have also undertaken other measures to Iraqify Kuwait, such as:

Forcing Kuwaitis to replace Kuwaiti identity cards by Iraqi cards;

Changing names of districts, streets, hospitals and public buildings;

Prohibiting the use of the Kuwaiti dinar after placing it on a par with the Iraqi dinar, which is worth 14 times less;

Making Kuwaiti time the same as Iraqi time (there is a one-hour difference);

Removing the picture of the Emir of the country and putting Saddam Hussein's picture up in establishments and public places;

Replacing Kuwaiti car number plates by Iraqi plates; if plates were not changed, no petrol was allowed and the car would be confiscated;

Setting up large portraits of Saddam Hussein in public squares and main streets;

Installation of Iraqi families in Kuwait; and Taking away passports and other identity documents from Kuwaitis leaving Kuwait.

Arrests

Immediately after entering Kuwait, Iraqi forces started the implementation of their plan of aggression by arresting Kuwaiti citizens in the streets of Kuwait, especially at checkpoints set up at strategic points in the capital and other towns in contravention of the general provisions of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (1949). Iraqi army and intelligence officers arrested more than 1,000 Kuwaiti citizens, including businessmen, chairmen and members of the boards of banks and companies and senior officials in the Ministry of Finance and the General Authority for Investment. A large number of senior officials were arrested, particularly those working in the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, the Interior and Defence.

In each case, the Iraqis do not indicate either the reason for the arrest or the charges. Detainees are taken to detention centres which were set up in sports clubs and schools. Relatives of detainees are not allowed to visit them or even ask questions about them. It is known that some detainees were released after paying bribes to Iraqi officials, who are usually corrupt. Arrest is usually accompanied by violence and ill-treatment not only of the detainee, but also of all members of the family and any other person who may be involved in the matter, even by simply asking about the reason for the arrest.

Detention has increased sharply since mid-August, as Iraqi forces started to hold Kuwaiti youths to stop them from taking part in the resistance. One way or another, more than 100,000 persons were arrested at checkpoints and during the night. The Iraqi forces arrested many women and children, accusing them of writing statements of loyalty to their country and legitimate Government on the walls. In many cases, the person concerned is not arrested alone, but is taken along with all members of his family and all of them are subjected to torture. If Iraqi forces find themselves unable to arrest a certain person, they arrest all members of his family, as well as his neighbours and acquaintances, and subject them all to torture in order to force the person concerned to hand himself over to Iraqi authorities, in violation of article 53 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (1949). According to official Kuwaiti statistics, there are some 8,170 military detainees in Baghdad and Mosul alone. There are 30 Kuwaiti women detained in Kuwait and 400 Kuwaiti women detained in Baghdad in addition to 50 Kuwaiti families detained in Basra. We do not yet have accurate statistics on the number and fate of other civilian detainees.

Detention may last for one day or several months; the fate of a large number of Kuwaiti citizens detained at the beginning of the invasion is still unknown. The Iraqi authorities do not permit visits to detainees, and on more than one occasion, any person who asked questions about the detainees was detained himself. It is also known that thousands of Kuwaiti detainees were removed to Basra, Baghdad and Mosul under very harsh and dangerous conditions. According to one detainee's account, during the first few days of the invasion, the Iraqi authorities tied detainees up hand and foot and left them in the desert without food or water. It should be noted that the temperature at that time was over 50° C in the shade. An official of the Kuwaiti Red Crescent Society says: "Daily aggressions and harassment of citizens have become a matter affecting people to a great extent; no man can move freely or without fear of detention, murder or kidnapping. Raids on houses became an ordinary event that was to be expected by any citizen at any time and arrest and torture became a danger threatening every person without exception. The Iraqi authorities do not bring detainees to trial; detention and investigation of individual cases under torture, punishment and even killing take place in the many detention camps in Kuwait depending on the mood of the intelligence and other occupation authorities".

There are many examples of arrests in official reports of the Government of Kuwait and the reports of international human rights organizations, such as Amnesty International, the Arab Organization for Human Rights and Middle East Watch, of which we quote some examples:

Iraqis arrested a number of former members of the National Assembly (Parliament) and the current members of the National Council and tortured them as a punishment for their refusal to co-operate with the occupation authorities. Reports mentioned the names of Mr. Mubarak Addoweileh, Mr. Khaled Sultan Al-Issa, Abdel-Kerim Aljoheidly and Jasser Aljasser.

Mr. Nihal Mokrad, former Secretary-General of Kuwait Labour Union, was arrested in the first days of the occupation and his whereabouts are still unknown.

Mr. Hamad Soyan, Chairman of the Union of Petroleum Workers, was detained more than once and his fate is still unknown.

A Kuwaiti citizen in his sixties (his family requested that his name should be withheld for his safety) who is a well-known businessman was arrested on the evening of 3 August at his home when soldiers came to inquire about one of his relatives who happened to be abroad at that time. This citizen was taken in place of the relative and, until now, no member of his family knows where he is being detained or how the state of his health is. He is known only to have been removed along with thousands of other detainees to Iraq.

In October, four young men were detained in Kaifan by Iraqi soldiers who saw them distributing frozen fish to citizens. These young men had already obtained a written authorization from the officer responsible for the district to do this job. Their fate is still unknown.

A 16-year-old Kuwaiti student at Farwanieh School was detained on 1 October for violation of the curfew and was taken to the police station of Rabia and placed in a cell with four other detainees. He was tortured and beaten every day and his body was burnt with a hot iron rod, which left a scar in the form of the letter H. He was released after being threatened that he would be murdered if he was arrested again.

On 10 November, an Iraqi officer went to Alfayhaa Co-operative and tried to enter the Co-operative, but officials of the Co-operative asked him to take his turn in the queue. The officer came back later in the evening with a number of soldiers and arrested the young men who work in the Co-operative and detained them in the Alfayhaa police station, accusing them of stealing municipality cars. A decision was made to detain them for 15 days prior to trial in Al Basra. However, after giving the officer a bribe of a television and a video cassette recorder and obtaining a letter from the municipality stating that the cars were given to the Co-operative as a gift, the five men were released.

Six doctors and officials of the Kuwaiti Red Crescent Society were arrested after being invited to a meeting with officials of the Iraqi Red Crescent Society; the meeting was never held. After being detained for 26 days, they were released and a decision was taken to dissolve the Kuwaiti Red Crescent. This decision had adverse effects on the health situation in Kuwait, as this Red Crescent Society was the only organization offering humanitarian services in the absence of the health system that had collapsed as a result of the invasion.

A 33-year-old Kuwaiti citizen who worked in the General Authority for Agriculture was detained on a charge of giving assistance to the resistance. His family, including his children, were cross-examined by the Iraqis, who threatened to detain them if they did not testify against him.

Iraqi forces raided the house of the noted Kuwaiti politician, Mr. Faisal Assanei, on 25 September and detained him with his 13-year-old son, Ziad, as well as 17 other persons who were visiting him. After detention and torture for three months, they were all released except for Mr. Assanei, whose whereabouts are still unknown.

A 22-year-old Kuwaiti, Abdullah Assalem, was arrested on 27 August upon leaving his house in the evening. He was detained for 17 days during which he was subjected to severe torture to make him give information on the resistance. Members of his family were harassed daily with telephone calls while he was in detention.

The Arab Organization for Human Rights states in its report on the "Situation of Human Rights in Kuwait Since the Iraqi Invasion" that reports received by the organization speak of the arrest of some elements of the Iraqi opposition who were living in Kuwait before the invasion and their deportation to Baghdad. The organization received the names of several of those opposition elements. Human rights circles are very concerned because some of those detainees are charged with membership of the prohibited Islamic Adda'awa (call) Party which is punishable by death in Iraq.

These are a few examples of detentions which have become a matter of routine in occcupied Kuwait. The most striking examples of detentions are perhaps those of Western and Japanese nationals. The plight of those taken to Iraq to be used as human shields will be discussed below.

Acts of torture and violence

Immediately upon entering Kuwait, the forces of aggression started their practices of violence, intimidation and arrests in violation of international customs and the Geneva Conventions of 1949. The Iraqi authorities resorted to the most heinous methods and developed the most cruel ways of torturing innocent Kuwaiti citizens in violation of articles 27, 31 and 32 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilians in Time of War (1949). The above-mentioned Amnesty International report states that the Iraqi authorities used 38 different ways to torture detainees, the worst of which include plucking out the eyes, breaking bones, throwing the person from a rooftop, pulling out fingernails and toenails, drilling the hands and feet with an electric tool, cutting off tongues and ears, close-range shooting, rape and applying electric shocks to sensitive parts of the body.

Torture is used as a means of obtaining information on senior Government officials and the hiding places of members of the resistance, of army personnel and of foreigners, particularly Americans, British and French, and of forcing Kuwaiti citizens to co-operate with the Iraqis to abort resistance in all its forms and spread fear among the Kuwaitis.

Thousands of innocent Kuwaiti men, women and children have suffered from these terrorist acts and savage practices. No doubt the effects of most of these crimes will be permanent and will cause psychological disturbances for life. In this report, we record some cases of torture practised by the occupying Iraqi forces in Kuwait to illustrate the inhumane treatment of detainees.

Iraq is treating all detainees in a savage way; they are blindfolded, beaten, given electric shocks and crowded into very small rooms under very difficult conditions. The Iraqis starve detainees, throw garbage and rotten foodstuffs on them, allow them to go to the bathroom only once a day and give them contaminated drinking water which causes various intestinal diseases and diarrhoea. As part of the psychological torture of detainees and their families, Iraqi forces stage mock executions of detainees and contact their relatives in the middle of the night to give them terrifying accounts of what happened to their children.

In some cases, the torture of detainees continued for several days to force them to give false statements. Before a detainee was released, Iraqi authorities would force him to sign false statements, to undertake to carry out the instructions of the Iraqi forces and to co-operate with them at the risk of execution and killing his relatives if he did not obey those instructions.

An official of the Kuwaiti Red Crescent who was detained said that "Iraqi soldiers used to kick detainees in the stomach with their heavy army boots. I saw one of the detainees urinating blood, perhaps as a result of a haemorrhage in the kidney, his face showed signs that his hair had been pulled out by force and his nails had been pulled out; I also saw another detainee forced to walk after severe beating on the soles of his feet; he was screaming and his face and clothes were blood-stained".

Following are examples of torture as described in official Kuwaiti reports and reports of human rights organizations.

A 32-year-old Kuwaiti was arrested on 3 August on his way home after buying some food from the co-operative. He was detained for five days in the Salibieh police station, where he was beaten, given electric shocks and shot in the foot at close range.

A man in his thirties was arrested in the third week of August and again on 20 September on charges of membership in the armed forces and the Kuwaiti resistance. He was detained in a school, from which he was moved to Jahra police station, where he was beaten, kicked, given electric shocks and had heavy objects placed all over his body.

A 22-year-old student was arrested on 24 August during house searches in Roda district. He was detained for eight days in Roda police station and removed to Farwanieh police station, where he was beaten, kicked and burnt with cigarette butts on various parts of his body; his thigh was gashed with a knife.

A Kuwaiti 17-year-old boy was arrested in early September on the charge of possession of a rifle and manuals on weapons. He was detained for 36 days in several camps in Kuwait and Basra where he was exposed to beatings, mock execution, beatings on the feet and electric shocks and was threatened with sexual assault.

A 38-year-old citizen was arrested on 5 September on the charge of membership of the Kuwaiti resistance. He was detained in Showeikh district before he was moved to Basra. He was exposed to beatings, mock execution, torture by exposure to extreme cold and hot temperatures, was burnt with electric shocks and was hanged from a ceiling fan.

A 31-year-old citizen was arrested on 14 September in Dewanieh at his home and detained for three weeks in Farwanieh and Jahra police stations and in a Kuwaiti house used as a detention centre. Later he was removed to Basra where he was exposed to beatings, electric shocks and mock execution; he was forced to watch his relatives under torture and he was tortured before their very eyes.

A Kuwaiti youth in his thirties was arrested on 22 September on a charge of possession of leaflets describing methods of protection from chemical weapons. He was tortured for a week by beatings, kicking and burns, as well as sexual assault, in Farwanieh police station.

A 27-year-old student was arrested on 22 September after entering Kuwait to help his family leave the country. He was detained for 18 days in various detention camps in Kuwait City. Later he was removed to Basra and he was exposed to beatings, whipping, cold and hot temperatures for long periods and electric shocks.

An 18-year-old youth living in Sorra was detained in Farwanieh police station. When he returned to his family 10 days later he could neither walk nor talk normally. He was assaulted sexually and tortured with electric current on his genitals, ears and lips and was hanged by the feet.

A handicapped 24-year-old youth living in Do'ayah gives an account of his suffering with his handicapped colleagues: "They dragged me out of bed, I was taken to the police station, where I was beaten with a heavy stick on the first day; my body was black and blue with many bruises; I was threatened with execution and the aluminium bar I wore on my disabled leg was broken; after I was moved to the juvenile offenders' prison in Ferdaws district, I saw boys of 14-15 years and I heard their screams under torture. I shared the room with two others; one limped and was 16 years old; these were signs of torture and beating on his face. The other was 25 years old.

A 31-year-old Kuwaiti doctor specializing in vocational medicine who worked as a volunteer in Ahmadi and Al-Agdan hospitals during the months of August and September gave the following account of some aspects of Iraqi crimes:

Bodies were brought to the hospital at the rate of five or six a day. The dead were all males in their twenties with very clear signs of torture on their bodies. On the basis of my personal observation I could determine some of the methods of torture used on them. These included cigarette burns, burns caused by hot irons, electric shocks, cutting off tongues and ears, plucking out eyes and breaking of limbs, pulling out nails and beatings for a long time on the soles of the feet until pus formed. There were other clear signs that victims were left hanging by their feet for a long time. On other victims, there were signs that their beards were plucked out by force. Bullet shots were clear in the hand of one of the victims and in the thigh of another. In most cases, death was caused by one shot to the lower part of the back of the head.

Another doctor working in the Kuwaiti Crescent gives another account of dreadful torture before death:

> "I examined 60 bodies of persons who were killed by a shot to the lower part of the back of the head. Signs of torture were clear on 60 bodies, including burning various parts of the body, breaking of limbs, beatings by sharp heavy objects, plucking out the hairs of the beard (in the case of one person), pulling nails off fingers and toes, electric shocks to the genitals (three cases) and cigarette burns in the eyes (three cases). It was clear that some victims died under torture and not by shooting."

Mohamed, a 20-year-old Kuwaiti youth who lived with his 80-year-old grandmother was detained and returned to the house with his eyes plucked out. Iraqi intelligence officers rang the bell and asked the grandmother to come and see him. She could not because of her old age and because she was blind.

The Iraqis forced every person in the house to leave the house and to stand in one line in front of the house. They carried Mohamed from the car because he was unable to walk and shot him in the presence of his family and left his body on the street. They did not allow anyone to come near the body for 24 hours and prevented everyone from entering the house to console the grandmother.

A Kuwaiti youth of the Deshti family was arrested at his house in the middle of the night. Three days later, the Iraqis threw his body in a garbage sack. The body had no hands or ears and there were signs of torture on the other parts of his body.

Arbitrary killing

Iraqi invading forces and intelligence in the State of Kuwait since 2 August 1990 have practised the most heinous crimes of murder against innocent persons in occupied Kuwait. Hundreds of children, women and men, Kuwaitis and foreigners alike, were victims of these crimes which are violations of all international conventions and customs.

These crimes have shown the world the unspeakable truth of the intentions and methods of the Iraqi régime in dealing with innocent persons. Perhaps the most outrageous crime committed by the Iraqi authorities was the deliberate murder of 300 newborn babies who were taken out of their incubators in the Obstetrics Hospital (report of Amnesty International, December 1990, p. 56) for no other reason than to steal the incubators and ship them to Iraqi hospitals. The atrocity of murder is demonstrated by the manner of killing people, especially detainees. After being tortured until they are nearly dead, they are taken to their houses, where they are shot in the head or the chest in the presence of all members of the family, particularly the elderly, children and mothers who are forced to witness these crimes.

Random horrendous killings spread terror throughout the population and no citizen felt safe. Iraqi authorities carried out death penalties and killings for the slightest reason, without consideration for the elderly, children, men and women, in violation of article 168 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. Many children and citizens were killed for merely carrying the flag of Kuwait or the portrait of the Emir of Kuwait or for writing national slogans on walls, distributing food, collecting garbage or participating in peaceful demonstrations. Iraqi authorities applied the death penalty to those who refused to put up the portrait of Saddam Hussein when asked to do so. They further extended the death penalty as of 25 August to any person who accommodated a foreigner, particularly a Westerner. Iraqi authorities also made another decision threatening senior Kuwaiti officials with the death penalty if they did not resume work as of 22 September 1990.

According to available estimates, more than 1,000 civilians have been killed at the hands of Iraqi authorities since the invasion of 2 August 1990. Until this very day, the Iraqi authorities continue their practice of killing without trial and murdering innocent Kuwaiti citizens in order to intimidate the Kuwaiti people and force it to submit to occupation.

Some examples are given below of the crimes of murder committed by Iraqi authorities, as reported by official sources and international humanitarian organizations.

The Kuwaiti Ambassador in London, Mr. Ghazi Arrayis, told a television audience how the Iraqis killed his brother-in-law (brother of his wife), Mr. Adel Al-Fallah: "While he was having lunch with his wife and three daughters (one, four and six years old), Iraqi soldiers came to the house and arrested him for investigation. After a while, they brought him home. He was on the point of death as a result of severe torture; the soldiers ordered the wife and the three daughters, as well as the neighbours, to assemble in front of the house where they shot Mr. Al-Fallah in their presence. His crime was providing food to Western residents."

Citizen Mubarak Fallah Annout, 44 years old, father of eight children, worked as a director of a co-operative and was a peaceful man who devoted himself to the service of citizens from the very first day of the occupation. A member of his family said that he was ordered by Iraqi authorities on 7 September to hang Saddam Hussein's portrait in the co-operative instead of the portrait of the Emir of Kuwait. When he refused, he was shot in front of the co-operative in the presence of all the employees of the co-operative as well as passers-by.

Citizen Mohammed Khalifa Al-Jassem, 32 years old, was the chairman of a youth fund in Salmiya and was a volunteer worker in a co-operative. He drafted and printed some leaflets urging citizens to conserve foodstuffs. The Iraqi authorities considered his leaflets a hostile act against the occupation and executed him in the presence of a crowd.

Dr. Balhan (Kuwaiti national), deputy director of the Cancer Centre at Sabbah Hospital, was executed by Iraqi authorities after being accused of concealing medical instruments and supplies in a hospital store.

Citizen Ali Mohammed Al-Ajami, member of the national Petroleum Trade Union, was executed in front of his house and nine children, some of whom are not even 10 years old.

Citizen Sanaa Annoury, a female student at the Kuwait University Faculty of Law, aged 25, was killed on 8 August when Iraqi authorities opened fire on a peaceful demonstration by a group of women in Jaberiya against the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait. In the same incident a girl in her twenties and two boys (aged 13 and 16) died as a result of head wounds. Iraqi authorities also opened fire on another peaceful demonstration in Ramithiya on 11 August and wounded several persons.

British businessman Douglas Croskery was killed when Iraqi soldiers shot him at the Kuwaiti-Saudi border on 11 August while he was trying to cross into Saudi Arabia.

Citizen Ahmed Qabazared, in his late thirties and employed by the Ministry of the Interior, was arrested for possession of leaflets. In the first week of September, he was returned home in Jaberiya, all members of his family were brought outside the house, the house was burned and he was shot in the presence of his entire family. Signs of severe torture were apparent on his hands, feet and the rest of his body. His left ear was cut, his right eye was plucked out and his fingernails and toenails were pulled out; cigarette burns were evident all over his body.

Citizen Saleh Hussein was arrested on 2 September at his home in Sabiya with some of his guests. He was executed on 8 September in front of his house in the presence of his mother, brothers and neighbours. According to the doctor who examined the body, there were clear signs of torture by electricity and burning by hot iron rods on his back, abdomen and hands. It was also clear that cigarettes were used to burn his entire body.

Citizen Badr Rajab, who was employed by Sabiya Co-operative and a father of eight children, was found dead in a garbage sack on 8 September in Sabiya. His hands were tied and his head was wrapped in the Kuwaiti flag. The cause of death was two blows on the head above the ear. It was said that he was planning with others to set up a bakery in his area.

Iraqis killed seven young Kuwaitis in September after detaining them for two weeks during which they were subject to severe torture. The seven were doing voluntary social work in Mubarak Hospital.

Eyewitnesses report that, on 9 September, a number of wounded Iraqi military men were brought to Al-Addan Hospital for treatment. An officer died on the same day and the Iraqis executed five employees of the hospital, including Citizen Adel Dashti, of the hospital public relations section, on the charge that they neglected to treat the Iraqi officer.

Kuwaiti doctor Hisham Al-Abeidan, in his thirties, was a member of the staff of the Obstetrics Hospital. He was arrested at his home on 1 October and accused of providing medical treatment to members of the resistance. He was executed in front of his house a few days later. According to the Egyptian doctor who examined the body, the deceased was tortured cruelly during his detention.

There is also the tragedy of a 19-year-old Kuwaiti student who was arrested on 11 September because he did not hand over his hunting rifles to the Iraqi authorities. He was detained for two weeks in a house in Jahra during which he was tortured. At 2.30 a.m. on 24 September, an officer told all detainees that they would be released upon instructions from the President of Iraq. The Kuwaiti youth was removed with 11 other detainees in a bus to the Dasman Palace where he was put on a bus with two others to take them home. The bus moved towards Al-Fayhaa district, where one of the detainees lived. In front of a house, the detainees were ordered to get out of the bus and stand in line in front of a house where they were blindfolded and shot. The three fell, two died, but the young man was wounded in the head. After Iraqi soldiers ascertained that the three had been shot in the head, they left the place, but the young man crawled to a neighbouring house, where he was treated.

Sexual Abuse and Rape

Iraqi soldiers committed the worst crimes against Kuwaiti citizens and residents of different nationalities in Kuwait. These include the sexual abuse and rape of women, as well as of men and children. In committing these abhorrent, immoral, irreligious and inhuman crimes, the Iraqis have added a black record to the history of mankind. They have violated article 27 of the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War and article 76 of Additional Protocol I.

We give here some examples of the brutal and shameful acts committed by Iraqi soldiers in occupied Kuwait. According to those who have left Kuwait, there are hundreds of cases of the sexual abuse of males and females, of Kuwaiti and other nationalities. However, in view of prevailing social traditions and customs and the implications of these shameful acts, the majority of cases of sexual abuse are, and will remain, under the seal of secrecy.

On the first day of the invasion, Iraqi soldiers sexually abused eight Philippine nurses in Al-Jahrah Hospital. In September, they sexually abused nurses of the same nationality in Al-Sabah Hospital. This brutal act terrified the rest of the nurses, especially the Philippine ones, who make up most of the medical staff in Kuwait, and they had to run away.

Dr. Fawziyah Al-Gattan, a gynaecologist, stated in her testimony to the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee that, during her work at the maternity hospital in Al-Sabah neighbourhood, she treated a large number of women of various nationalities who had been sexually and brutally abused by Iraqi soldiers. She described some cases as follows:

"I recall that, during the early days of the invasion, five Iraqi soldiers repeatedly sexually abused a Jordanian woman in her 20s after having kidnapped her on the street. Seven Iraqi soldiers also sexually abused a Palestinian woman kidnapped on the street. I tried to treat the wounds of the victims but I was unable to relieve their psychological pain and suffering, which will undoubtedly be a nightmare for them for the rest of their lives."

Dr. Fawziyah went on to say: "I remember very well that, on 11 November, a Kuwaiti woman came to the hospital with her two daughters; she was trying to relieve them of the psychological shock they had had. She told me that Iraqi soldiers entered her house in the early morning hours and began beating the men and threatening them with guns. They took all the members of the family to the first floor, then they took the two girls one after the other to a separate room where they sexually abused them while the rest of the family listened to their cries without being able to do anything. The soldiers forced the mother to witness the sexual abuse of her single daughters".

A gynaecologist working at the maternity hospital during the early weeks of the invasion said: "Iraqi soldiers sexually abused a 20-year old Jordanian girl kidnapped on the street while she was going to the grocery store. Then she was thrown back on to the street once again. When I examined the victim, I found her vagina swollen as a result of violent rape. I also found traces of scratches and bruises on her face and hands. She was in a hysterical state".

The same doctor said in his report: "Iraqi policemen brought two girls to the hospital, one a 20-year-old of unknown nationality. She told me that, while she and her family were sleeping, Iraqi soldiers came to their house at about 6 a.m. and went up to the top floor, where they sodomized her several times". The doctor added: "When I examined her, I noticed a 4 cm fissure close to her vagina, which was treated with five stitches. In addition, I found signs of resistance on her body. The victim stated that the soldiers also raped her two older sisters". He also said that he knew of many such cases, but the victims did not want to reveal their identity.

Two Kuwaiti girls, 18 and 19 years of age, were taken from their house in Kuwait by occupation soldiers and sexually abused throughout the night. The aim was to force them to confess that their brother was a member of the Kuwaiti resistance. The next day, their brother went to the Iraqi authorities and lied to them, saying that he was a member of the resistance in order to save his sisters. He was punished by severe torture, including having his toe nails pulled out.

In September, a Western woman was sexually abused and soldiers forced her husband to witness the crime.

Iraqi soldiers at an inspection post forced Kuwaiti women to take off their clothes and walk back and forth while Iraqi soldiers cheered and laughed.

A report by Amnesty International (December 1990) states: "Since the beginning of September, Amnesty International has received increasing reports of sexual abuse of Kuwaiti and Arab women by Iraqi military men". An Egyptian diplomat states that, on 3 August, Iraqi soldiers sexually abused three Egyptian hostages staying at the Meridien Hotel. An Egyptian nurse working at Mubarak Hospital said that, in the hospital, she treated many cases of sexual abuse, including the case of a hysterical Kuwaiti woman from Al-Salimiyeah neighbourhood. A medical doctor of the Kuwaiti Red Crescent said that, according to their sources, Al-Jahrah Hospital received 15 cases of sexual abuse, Al-Rakah Hospital 15 cases and the maternity hospital 3 cases. An Egyptian doctor working in Al-Sabah Hospital said that a Kuwaiti woman of a well-known family from Al-Jabiriyah neighbourhood came to the hospital with her 19-year-old daughter, saying that, at the end of August, while her daughter was returning home from the co-operative after having bought food, she was followed by three Iraqi soldiers and an officer. The mother knew what they were up to, so she pleaded with them not to abuse her virgin daughter sexually, and offered herself to them in order to spare her daughter. That is what actually happened.

The Amnesty International report also states: "A Kuwaiti woman left Kuwait on 27 November because she and her sister were threatened with sexual abuse in front of their brother, a journalist, who was arrested for his opposition to the Iraqi régime, in order to obtain information from him. This woman also described the tragedy of a Kuwaiti family living in the Al-Remethiyah neighbourhood, where Iraqi soldiers sexually abused four daughters in the presence of their father. She also told the story of a Kuwaiti girl whom she saw naked and sexually abused at Sabah Al-Salim police station".

Acts of sexual abuse by Iraqi soldiers and authorities are not limited to women, but extend to many men and children, especially those detained and tortured to make them provide information. There are many examples of threats against, and the sexual abuse of men, as indicated in the reports of humanitarian organizations.

A man in his thirties told an Amnesty International Official that he was arrested on 22 September. One of the acts of torture he was subjected to was that Iraqis spread his legs and introduced a bottle neck up his anus.

A 17-year-old student said that he had been detained for two months in Basra and subjected to various acts of torture, including sexual abuse by means of the neck of a whisky bottle.

Violation of the rights of non-Kuwaitis

The question of occupied Kuwait is a humanitarian issue with international dimensions. Suffering has not been limited to Kuwaitis, for war and repression by Iraqi authorities have affected nearly 1.5 million persons from more than 120 States who were making their living in Kuwait and contributing to the country's development and civilization.

The Iraqi invaders have made no distinction between Kuwaitis and other Arab citizens in denying them their basic human rights. Arabs working in Kuwait have been tragically affected, for many of them have been detained and subjected with their families to ill-treatment, including insults, beating, sexual abuse, confiscation of property, curfew, expulsion from their homes and confiscation of their cars.

The Palestinians are the most affected Arab community; nearly 400,000 of them lived in Kuwait before the invasion. Kuwait gave them a livelihood and shelter. They enjoyed a comfortable life and received free medical treatment and education in public hospitals and schools.

As a result of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and the repressive practices engaged in, more than 250,000 Palestinians left Kuwait for Jordan, leaving behind their livelihoods, including their shops, public and non-public posts, property, wealth and bank deposits. As for Palestinians who decided to stay in Kuwait, their actual material incomes have gone down because their monthly salaries are paid in Iraqi dinars, which have a low purchasing power after having been placed on a par with the Kuwaiti dinar. The Palestinians' salaries are therefore equivalent to 10 per cent of their value before the invasion. As a result, they lost their bank savings and became unable to send remittances to their relatives in Jordan and occupied territories or to their children studying abroad and to pay the liberation tax.

The Egyptians are the other Arab community which has also suffered a great deal. More than 200,000 Egyptians used to work in various fields such as medicine, teaching, law, nursing, secretarial work, industry, agriculture and construction. Some Egyptians had been living in Kuwait for more than 35 years and Kuwait was considered their second home. They lost the savings they had placed in Kuwaiti banks throughout their lives.

Egyptians in Kuwait suffered a great deal, for they were treated very badly by the invading Iraqi authorities, especially after Egypt made known its official position rejecting the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait. Most of them left Kuwait for Egypt via Iraq and Jordan under very harsh and dangerous conditions, which led in some cases to the death of many men, children and women in the desert because they were shot at by Iraqi soldiers or because of thirst and extreme heat.

Iraqi soldiers applied this cruel and brutal treatment to citizens of other Arab countries which rejected the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait, such as Syria and Lebanon. Reports received by humanitarian organizations dealing with human rights state that Iraqi soldiers sexually abused many Arab women, especially Egyptian, Jordanian and Palestinian women.

As for citizens of Western States and Japan, their suffering was different. They lived in a state of fear of being killed by Iraqis. This was after Iraq's decision of 25 August to require every Western and Japanese foreigner to give himself up to the Iraqi authorities (the decision also provided for the execution of anyone who gives shelter to a foreigner or helps him hide or run away). Thousands of foreigners were arrested, especially Americans, Canadians, English, French and citizens of other European countries, as well as Japanese, all of whom were taken to Baghdad. Iraq announced that they had been placed at military and industrial installations as human shields, thus violating international conventions, especially article 51, paragraph 7, of Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions. These captives lived in a state of anxiety, terror and fear for their fate and that of their families. Even those who were not arrested did not dare leave their hiding places to meet their needs. They lived in a state of constant terror and were very afraid of being discovered or that the persons who gave them shelter and helped them obtain food would be arrested.

In addition to all this suffering, many foreign women were subjected to sexual abuse or the threat of sexual abuse and personal insults in the presence of their husbands and children.

Before the Iraqi invasion, there were about 450,000 Asians, most of whom were from India, Pakistan, Philippines and Bangladesh, who came to make their living in Kuwait. Their remittances to their countries, which amounted to millions of dollars annually, supported hundreds of thousands of families in those countries. These persons lived, and some still live, in a situation that is no less tragic than the situation of Kuwaitis themselves, for they were subjected to captivity, threats, torture, sexual abuse and killing. Many Asians have described their agony during their journeys back to their countries via Iraq and Jordan after having lost their savings and have told stories of hunger, pain, torture and insults. The Iraqi authorities also took away what was left of their savings and personal possessions.

Desecration of holy places and prevention of worship

Iraqi soldiers committed shameful acts contrary to the divine laws and teachings of various religions, including the desecration of mosques and churches in Kuwait. They not only bombarded these places with tank cannons, but also entered them with weapons and used them as headquarters for soldiers, in violation of article 53 of Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions.

According to refugee witnesses from Kuwait, the Iraqis prevented worshippers from holding collective prayers and delivering speeches calling upon people to hold together and ask God to save Kuwait and citizens from the tyranny of the Iraqi invasion.

In addition, the Iraqi authorities insulted religious men and imams of mosques and desecrated the Holy Koran by throwing it on the ground and treading on it. On Friday, 3 August, Iraqi soldiers forced their way into a mosque in the Kefan neighbourhood where hundreds of Kuwaiti citizens had gathered for the Friday prayer. The soldiers ordered worshippers to leave the mosque and, when some of them refused to do so, a number of them were shot and killed. Several mosques were closed after their imams had been arrested for their opposition to the Iraqi invasion. The Iraqi authorities issued an order to have beards shaven, since they are a sign of religiosity; Iraqi soldiers plucked out hair from the face of anyone who resisted this order and, in some cases, they burnt the detainees' beards.

Iraqis denied worship on Sundays to about 300,000 or 400,000 Christians of Western, Asian and Arab communities, after having looted churches and destroyed places of prayer. Christians who have fled Kuwait have described their deep suffering as a result of the Iraqi soldiers' conduct and inhuman treatment.

The invasion of Kuwait on 2 August 1990 is the tragedy not only of Kuwait and the Kuwaitis, but also of the whole world. The events of Kuwait have adversely affected the States and peoples of the region and the States of the Arab and Islamic world. These events have especially affected the economies of countries that used to depend on the Gulf States for imported employment, trade, loans and foreign aid.

According to what has been said in the present report, there is no doubt that the Iraqi invading forces have committed, and continue to commit, the worst crimes against Kuwaitis and residents of Kuwait without any deterrent in terms of conscience, religion or law. They have added a black record to the history of Iraq and of mankind. If these acts suggest anything, it is the brutality of the Iraqi régime and Iraq's non-respect for human rights and non-compliance with international conventions, especially the 1949 Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols.
